Martin Robertson

The Fall

I tripped and fell, heavy on knees and knuckles, gripping the handle of my heavy bag, my weight behind me grinding my raw knuckles in the rough black London grime.

I've fallen before

(my feet almost as clumsy as my fingers) but always up almost before I was down, taking a pride in that. This time it took a passage of time, an effort of conscious will, to heave my heaviness off my hurting knuckles, get me on my feet again. Another milestone.

 $This poem is reprinted from Now and Then, the website devoted to the poetry of Martin Robertson, at {\tt http://rtnl.org.uk/now_and_then/linearity}. The poem is reprinted from Now and Then, the website devoted to the poetry of Martin Robertson, at {\tt http://rtnl.org.uk/now_and_then/linearity}. The poem is reprinted from Now and Then, the website devoted to the poetry of Martin Robertson, at {\tt http://rtnl.org.uk/now_and_then/linearity}. The {\tt http://rtnl.org.u$