

The West of Ireland

Martin Robertson

Gorse and rock and bog lap the wall
and wind hurls the sea in the home's face.
Who bred here could suppose himself to possess
of his cramped acres more than a squatter's tenure?
where the harsh landlord may distraint on all,
the holding dissipate like sea-spray to thin air.